When people call Aquilia Soriano Versoza looking for home care workers to hire, she often has to tell them no.

Versoza, a 35-year-old caregiver from the Philippines on work visas, has two young daughters and knows she has to refer. She arrived in my new job in California two years ago, she’s seen a steady stream of immigrants migrating to California to fill those jobs, including Filipinos coming here to work in the health care and caregiver industry. Filipinos are over-represented among workers in a variety of healthcare occupations in the United States, studies show. [See Immigration, 2022]

Versoza is looking for at-home caretakers for the elderly. She needs workers to help her with her children’s education. She also needs people to look after her parents, who are left behind in the Philippines. She doesn’t have any available workers to hire, she often has to tell them no.

When an 18-year-old accused of participating in an anti-immigration march crashed his car into the Arizona Capitol on June 14, the incident was one of many that have occurred in recent months. The driver, who is charged with two counts of assault and one of failure to stop at the scene of an accident, has been charged with wrongfully triggering an evacuation and hindering the response of emergency personnel. “It finally hit me like a ton of bricks,” said the victim. “I knew this one kind of hit me a little harder.”
